MISCELLANEOUS READING. COMMUNICATED. THE THREE LESSONS. There bloom'd a flow'r, of beauty bright,

Near to a woodland fair;—
With joy it drank the beams of light,
And breathed the morning air. Smiling ceneath the silv'ry flood, Which o'er its beauty fell-Naught to the flow'r came but good, 'Twas sweetest in the dell. Each stem-each leaf held firm, erect. With grace its lovely form,

Sweet flow'r! a lesson dost thou show. To man, by nature proud, Could be but learn to bow thus low. When breaks the threat'ning cloud. Humility, that grace so rare, Thus taught him by a flow'r,

In dark temptation's hour; In vain its fury spend, Which he had view'd with hopeless dread, Could he but learn to bend. The flow'r sweet, its fragrance shed Through the bright Summer hours,

With all the other flow'rs. Each withered leaf was swept away, And nought could there be seen, Through the cold Winter's dreamy stay, To prove such flow'r had been. The earth as wrapp'd in winding sheet, No trace of verdure show'd

Lock'd in embrace, so icy cold, Its babblings all were still'd, No longer on its waters roll'd, By Winter's touch 'twas chill'd. But Spring once more her pow'r assum'd And broke its prison bands, Nature her wonted charm resumed

Amid decay and gloom. Now it appeared, again to smile As sweetly as before— The heart of sadness to beguile, That long, dark winter o'er.

Each mortal there must lie, No earthly pow'r, no prayer can save, 'Tis written-we must die; Swept from the earth, as wither'd leaves, Fond memories will be-The friend, who bending o'er us grieves, In time, laid low as we; Doom'd, too, with us, to be forgot-

Oblivion's wing must fall, (Except the few of higher let,) Alike upon us all. Is borne on ev'ry breath, Cannot exemption-rescue, cl

So will the body of the dead Know an awakening. More sure 'twill wake than hidden flow'r, Whose germ decay may reach, Though human pride the grave devour, Thus doth the Scripture teach-

Not those alone who live-but all The buried dead, shall hear; Then cloth'd the soul shall be again, In its once cherish'd frame, Sweet joy to know, or longing vain, To bear mid'st endless shame.
